The temperature-dependent OH stretching infrared spectra of the van der Waals (vdW) complex of the sulfate anion, SO(3)(-) has been measured in the temperature range from 125 to 271 K, over the pressure range from 25 to 600 bar. The OH stretching fundamental band is observed to exhibit an anomalous temperature dependence in which the spectral intensity decreases with increasing temperature. This result is in stark contrast to the room temperature behavior and suggests that the complex dissociates at ultra-low temperatures. The structure of the vdW complex is modeled using a potential energy surface generated using a 2D angular approach to include all intermolecular interactions as well as a polarizable continuum model to represent the solvent. From this model, it is determined that the ground state structure of the vdW complex lies in a local energy minimum at a separation of 3.28 A. The free energy minimum is found to be a saddle point such that at the most likely SO(3)(-):H(+)
